

Motion capture technology consists of multiple units placed on the body of the player with sensors on their boots. Data is captured, and the player is instantaneously replicated on screen to display in-game action. As the technology is specific to in-game gameplay, technical and other gameplay-related issues with reality capture that can occur in game — for example, incorrect repetition of players, faulty views or erroneous data — will not happen during in-game motion capture. The new capturing method not only provides accurate and reliable data that makes in-game simulations more lifelike, but also provides more realistic motion capture than previous versions. Fast Flow Video Systems Media Spokesperson Freddy Michiels: “Players in the first FIFA on the Wii received motion capture data from only one and a half player replicas, with only one full-body data collection. Now, thanks to a new capturing technique, players are now shown on screen in their natural, complete, motion capture state. Consequently, we can observe all their movements and tackle them precisely with total accuracy in the resulting gameplay.” Nikos Vatikiotis, Project Lead FIFA Team Engineer: “For the first time, players’ whole body movements are registered and transmitted accurately. Such fidelity and realism in sports games is becoming possible thanks to this new capture tech. That’s because we now capture the player with the total capture data set needed to replicate the player in-game. It is also important for the player to move in the same manner in-game as on the screen, thanks to the hyper motion tech.” Saw Wai Choi, EA Sports FIFA: “We couldn’t have made it better, and this is only the beginning. We are working closely with the FIFA development team to provide the best game experience for players.” Commenting on new pressing feature, SÃ©bastien Gerow, Senior Director, FIFA Team: “Pressure is key in real football, and now we are doing what we can to capture the correct pressure on the ball by replicating the right amount of force, and we’re getting there. Also, players get used to the new pressure system in training so when it comes to game, they know how to get the ball rolling the right way. We are really pleased with this refinement and we can’t wait for the FIFA Fan Festival for players to try it out for

Fifa 22 tips and tricks:

- Play FFT with friend! Call up your footballing buddy and go head to head! Your progress and gameplay statistics will be recorded and can be counted towards the reputation ranking of the club. You can also challenge the world record marks set by other players.
- Keep searching! Use the Teammate Radar to spot and call up teammates or just when you play online around the world you may find teammates.
- Corner! Just like in real life passing and crossing the ball is crucial so make sure you find the nearest open player and get them the ball for a chance!
- Keep team shape! Get into a shape that allows you to move freely as this is often where better movement and more chances will happen.
